

FAMILY BONDS

Titi monkeys form strong family bonds. The hormone oxytocin has been shown to play a critical role in maintaining these bonds in monkeys and humans.

Mouse studies have demonstrated that paternal separation impacts brain development and increases stress hormones in offspring.

Ongoing research into how oxytocin regulates social interaction could aid in the development of new therapies for autism and related disorders.

